- #The Recent Railway Accident - At the Upper Hutt yesterday an inquest was held at the Provincial Hotel before Dr Hacon Deputy Coroner upon the body of William Kemp who was killed on the 22nd at Silverstream, by a train passing over him. There were seven witnesses examined, and the enquiry lasted about two hours. The evidence brought to light the following facts, Deceased, William Kemp, was a ship's carpenter, and had been working at Prouse's sawmills, Whiteman's Valley. On the 22nd instant he was a passenger by the 4.45 train from Wellington to Silverstream, and was, when he entered the train, quite sober. He was in a second-class carriage, which contained two other passengers, and had a large sized flask of brandy with him of which he partook freely. On arriving at Silverstream he was quite drunk, and went to sleep inside the station. He was observed on the station when the next Hutt train passed, talking to some people. About 6 pm a plate-layer named Harland saw him sitting in the station in a state of intoxication, and left him there. This witness said he knew there was a special train expected to pass soon, but he had no duties in connection with the station. When the special train came up at 7.55 it was felt to go over something. The fireman, Henry Adams, had noticed an object lying on the edge of the platform. The train was then going six miles an hour. The object he saw on the platform fell off, and was recognised as being a man's body. An alarm was given, and the train pulled up in 40 or 50 yards, but the man had been cut through the middle, and his legs, arms, and back broken. The matter was reported to Constable Lyster, who had the remains conveyed to the Provincial Hotel. The jury returned a verdict to the effect that William Kemp, while in a state of intoxication, was accidentally killed by the train passing over him reference Papers past website Evening Post newspaper 26 May 1880
- #The Late Fatal Accidents - Mr Hewitt the station master at the Wellington railway station has furnished us with the following particulars of a fatal accident which occurred on the railway line on Saturday evening. A special train, consisting of engine, four carriages, and a guard's break van, left Wellington station at 7 pm. All went well, there being no stoppage until the train arrived at Silverstream, a flag-station where, under ordinary circumstances, no stoppage is made unless the signal is given by passengers who wish to get on the train or alight. There was no signal displayed, but the fireman as the train got within about ten yards of the platform discerned something protruding over the line of rails. There was no time to stop the train, and in a moment more the carriage steps came in contact with what proved to be the legs of a man lying on the platform. The concussion hurled him off on to the line, and the wheels of the first carriage ran over him, cutting and mangling his body horribly, and causing instantaneous death. It was found that the body was that of a man named Kemp, a saw-mill hand, and from the fact that a bottle of brandy was found on the platform near where he had been lying, and from the position he was in when first discovered, it is supposed that he had fallen asleep while intoxicated, and thus met with his death. There was no one on duty at the station, and the mangled remains were picked up and laid on the platform, and the occurrence reported to the police at the Upper Hutt. It should be stated that the night was clear and moonlight, and that the train carried the usual regulation lights a head lamp on the engine, and two side lights on the guard's van so that the unfortunate man, had he been awake, would have had ample time to move clear of the coming train. No blame under the circumstances can be attached to anyone in connection with the accident. We learn from Sergeant Anderson that the deceased was named William Kemp, that he was a carpenter employed at Prouse's Sawmill, Whiteman's Valley, and that he was a widower and leaves two children. He was struck by the step of the first carriage, and when picked up it was found that both his legs were broken and his body cut nearly in two. Intelligence of another fatal accident was received in town on Monday, though the particulars were of the most meagre description. Constable Lyness, who is stationed at the Upper Hutt, forwarded a report to the Central Station to the effect that James Gilchrist, a blacksmith, residing in Wellington, had been shot by a man named Raymond Johnstone, inspector of the road now being formed from the Upper Hutt to Waikanae. The accident happened at 11 am, and the unfortunate man died in a few minutes. The body was taken to the Criterion Hotel, where it awaits the inquest. The two men were out shooting together, but the constable did not state how the accident occurred reference Papers past website New Zealand Mail newspaper 29 May 1880

#The Inquests - Two inquests were held at the Upper Hutt, on May 25, the first was on the body of William Kemp, who met with his death at the Silverstream railway station on Saturday last. Six witnesses were examined, but the principal evidence was that of William Gough, the guard of the train which ran over the deceased. He deposed that the locomotive and two of the three passenger carriages attached had passed the platform, when witness, who was on the break van at the rear of the train, saw deceased falling from the edge of the station platform, on which he had apparently been lying, his fall being caused by the step of the third carriage striking against his legs, which had been dangling over the side of the platform. Witness put the breaks hard down, and the train was stopped, and on running back he saw deceased lying on the rail, his left leg cut nearly off, and the left foot smashed, the left hand was also injured, but strange to say deceased held in that hand a silver watch, attached to his neck by a long hair guard, and the watch was not damaged. Looking at it, witness saw that it was going, the hands marking just eight o'clock. Witness pulled down a gate, and with some assistance made a rough stretcher, and carried the body to the train, and took it on to the Upper Hutt, where it was left in charge of Constable Lester, as also some fragments of flesh found cut off the limbs of deceased by the wheels of the carriage, and found on the line. The evidence as to the previous whereabouts of the deceased showed that he had been in Wellington during the day, and left by the 4.25 train, being at that time perfectly sober. He had with him a bottle of brandy, and it was stated that he drank the contents on the journey, and that he consequently became very tipsy by the time the train arrived at Heywoods. On getting to Silverstream he alighted, but in his drunken foolishness wanted to get back into the train, saying that he wanted to go to town again. Two men who were there held him until the train started, and then put him on a seat in the waiting shed, where he fell asleep, and they left him. From that time until the accident occurred no one appears to have gone near him, but it is evident that he left the seat in the shed and sat on the outer edge of the platform, where he again fell into a drunken stupor, from which he never awoke to consciousness. When picked up on the rails he merely gave one or two faint gasps, and then died. He was a native of Scotland, had been in the colony about twelve months, and bore the repute of being a good workman. His two orphan boys, one aged seven and the other twelve years, have found good friends in their desolation. Mr William Gough, guard of the train, has taken charge of the younger lad, and Mr Prerose, of the sawmills where deceased had been employed, has taken charge of the elder, and will give him employment at the mills. The jury returned a verdict of accidental death. At half-past two pm an inquest was held touching the death of James Gilchrist, who was killed on the Queen's Birthday. From the evidence it appeared that deceased, who was a blacksmith, in the employ of Mr Mills of this city, and formerly a member of the firm of Gilchrst and Waters, had in the early part of the day gone to Mr Raymond Johnson's store, at Petone, having with him a gun and ammunition. He knew Mr Johnson well, and after chatting a while, asked him, if was doing nothing particular, to come out and see what sport they could get, saying that he (Gilchrist) had as yet only shot one bird, a kaka, and that they might, together, have better luck. Mr Johnson consented, and getting his gun, they went out together. After walking awhile, they sat down and had a smoke, and then he (Johnson) saw a kaka in one of the trees, which he pointed out to Gilchrist, and immediately afterwards he saw a pigeon fly into another tree. He called out to Gilchrist not to fire at the kaka, but to try and get the pigeon first, but Gilchrist did fire, and missed the bird, which rose from the tree to fly away, Gilchrist cried out to Johnson to run and have another shot before the kaka got out of range, and he,, taking the gun from his shoulder, ran in the direction towards where Gilchrist was standing, so as to get a good sight at the bird on the wing. Suddenly, as he ran, his gun went off, but for a moment he thought no harm had happened until he heard Gilchrist say, How come you to do that? Johnson ran towards him in time to catch him as he was falling, and Gilchrist then put his hand to his side said, I've got it all here, and then died. Mr Johnson, terribly distressed at the calamity, ran for assistance, but it was of no avail except to remove the body. Inspection showed that the gun charge had been lodged in the body of deceased, with the exception of two shots which penetrated the face. We understand that deceased, who was about forty years of age, leaves a widow and five children. The family reside in Pirie-street. The deceased and his family were spending their holiday at the house of Mr Brown, at the Upper Hutt, and it was Mr Brown and the guard and driver of a train that helped Mr Johnson to bring in the body. Medical examination of the body showed that the charge (of No 2 shot) struck the deceased in the breast and abdomen, but the principal portion lodged in the region of the heart, so that death was almost instantaneous. Great sympathy is expressed for the friends of deceased, and for Mr Johnson, who was the unintentional cause of the deplorable mishap, and who is a brother of the Inspector of Nuisances, and a great friend of deceased. He is overwhelmed with grief at the shocking event. The jury in this case also returned a verdict of accidental death reference Papers past website New Zealand Mail newspaper 29 May 1880
